DISSERTATION: “ESSAYS ON THE POLITICAL ECONOMY OF CRIMINAL PROSECUTIONS”

Abstract: Local prosecutors and trial judges are subject to reelection in nearly all U.S. states. This four-essay dissertation examines how electoral, policy-related, and racial considerations influence their behavior. First, I assess whether the political preferences of prosecutors shape racial charging disparities in state courts. Charging records from three states demonstrate that narrowly elected Republican prosecutors seek longer sentences than Democrats, but only on cases involving Black defendants. Next, this dissertation traces how geographic variation in reelection motives affects criminal prosecutions. I find that Black defendants tend to reside in, and the influence of partisanship on charging is most substantial in, precincts where Republican prosecutors perform poorly. Third, I develop a simple adverse selection model to illustrate how policy preferences and electoral concerns shape charging decisions and, in doing so, how potential reforms might alter disparities. Finally, I (along with Sanford Gordon) examine how changes in the perceived threat of recall affect judicial behavior. We find a significant, instantaneous increase in sentencing severity by Californian judges following a highly publicized recall campaign against one judge.
